

Bridge the retirement income gap

As their earnings increase, how will your clients maintain their income level in retirement? Life insurance can help.

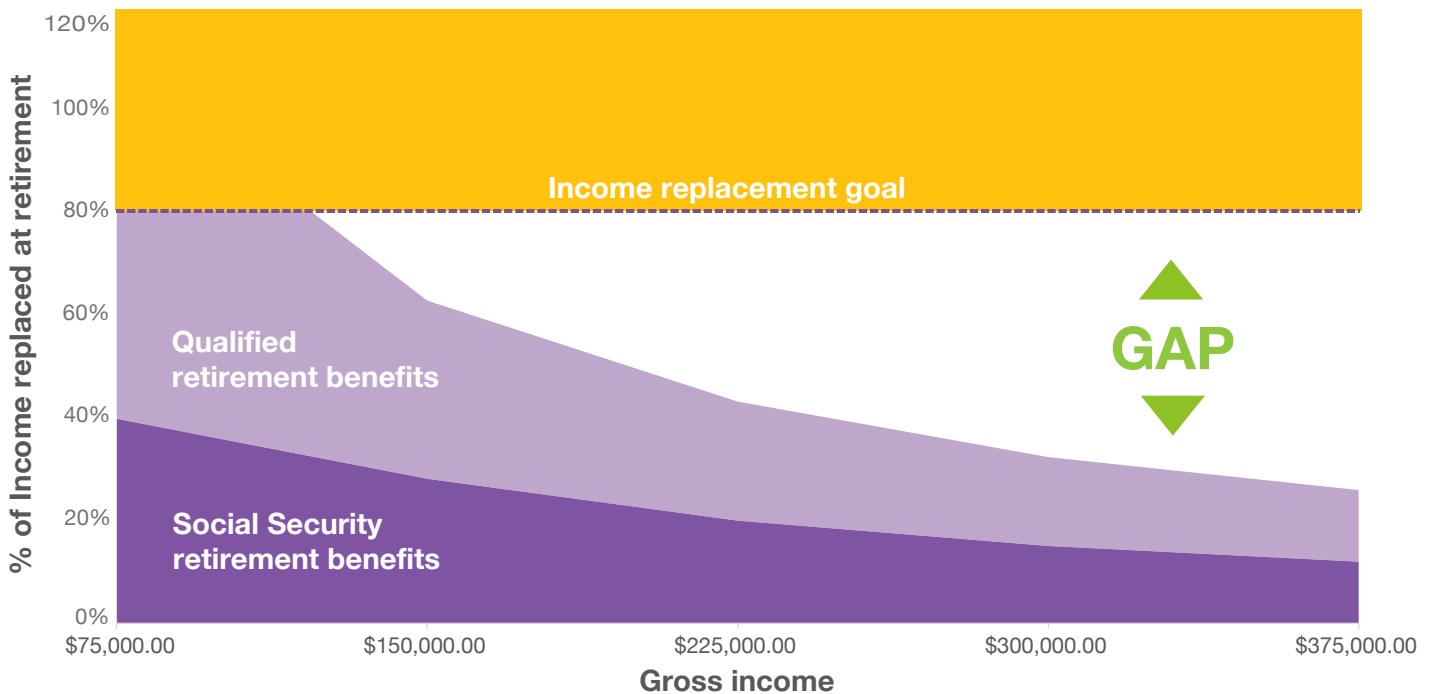

What is the retirement income gap

With Social Security and incentives that make tax-deferred savings plans like a 401(k) or an Individual Retirement Account (IRA) attractive, most Americans have the tools they need to adequately replace their income in retirement – experts recommend 80% of working income.

But Social Security benefits top out, and tax-deferred accounts have limits, so it can be challenging for individuals with higher incomes to save enough to maintain their lifestyle in retirement. That difference is called the retirement income gap. Life insurance – yes, life insurance – can help your clients close the gap.

How the retirement income gap can grow

The more your clients earn, the more retirement income they may have to make up if they rely on qualified savings plans alone. Diversifying sooner rather than later can help.

This hypothetical example is for illustrative purposes only and assumes a current age of 45, retirement age of 67, and the same income level each year. The graph assumes 401(k) annual contributions of the maximum employee allowed amount from age 40 to 66 and maximum annual distributions from age 67 to 121 of $52,045. It assumes social security distributions beginning at age 67 (ssa.gov/OACT/quickcalc).

The limits of qualified savings plans

Limits may change on an annual basis. Below are the limits, rules and restrictions for 2023:

Plan type	Maximum deferral	Maximum compensation eligible	Other notes
401(k)	$22,500 annually or $30,000 for those over 50	$330,000	Employees are considered highly compensated at $150,000 prior-year wages. Could be subject to contribution limit.
Profit-sharing	Total amount of company and employee contributions equal to the lesser of 100% of compensation or $66,000.	$330,000	N/A
Pension	$265,000	$330,000	N/A
IRA	$6,500, or $7,000 for those over 50	Those with modified adjusted gross income (AGI) above certain amounts (depending on filing status) can't deduct IRA contributions if also in a qualified retirement plan.	No Roth IRA contributions may be made if modified AGI is higher than $228,000 (married) or $153,000 (single).

For all of these plan types, early withdrawals could incur a 10% tax penalty in addition to taxes due at the client's standard tax bracket rate. Employer plan rules may further restrict or penalize early withdrawals.
